Final Scene, Showing Wall St. Curb Market, Arouses Audience to Cheers.

The third act of "Crooked Gamblers," A. H. Woods's 1930 model of a Wall Street play, which he revealed to the public on Saturday night at the Hudson Theatre, contains five scenes. Two are the offices of stock brokers on different floors of the same building, and they are flashed into view and then blackened out as the pictures of a cinema might be. The owner of a tire company is struggling desperately to save his company rom the machinations of a jobber, who has decided that good business has de-creed the time to wreck the company, Mr. and Mrs. Forsyth Wickes have In one office the broker sold the stock in large amounts to bring down its price. In the other the man who invented the ire and owns the business buys the stock to save his creation and his friends. Of course, he wins. Such is the correct course of business plays. The drama has its rules as well as Wall fice of the rival brokers. The scene was lively and realistic and awakened the

This third act did move rapidly and its climax was of a kind to stir the blood on a Saturday night in July. It had, moreover, the advantage of following two acts of lethal dulness.
